

BUILD

Orach Chaim

He sits at his bedroom window, watching other boys his age stride confidently toward futures that seem mapped out for them. His own path feels uncertain.

He's surrounded by people his age, yet feels completely alone. In classrooms built for linear learning, he's forgotten how to grow.

He's exhausted. From knocking at doors designed for someone else, and trying to fold and fit himself into boxes that were never meant for his shape, his spark slowly dims.

Or perhaps he no longer tries – rejection is all he knows and trying a thing forgotten.

Dejected. Uninspired. Invisible.

But some stories don't end there.

Orach Chaim is a place for boys who need something custom-made, it's the space they're given to become.

These aren't troubled teens. They're remarkable young men who march to their beat in a world that demands, expects, and celebrates conformity. Boys with bright minds that work differently. Boys with golden hearts whose spirits have been bruised by systems that couldn't recognise their worth.

Guided by two exceptional mechanchim HaRav Aryeh Goldberg and HaRav Yanky Neumann, Orach Chaim operates on the overarching principle of envisioning who a boy can become rather than judging where he stands today.

Talented and choshuve bnei torah spend their days learning and shmoozing with the boys, giving them a taam and chiyus for growth. A high staff-to-student ratio means that everyone is noticed, appreciated, and accounted for.

Gone are rigid rows and one-size-fits-all approaches. Instead, boys gather for roundtable learning tailored to their individual styles. Morning workouts energise them before engaging shiurim. Hands-on programs — from first aid to construction to sofer training — help them discover hidden strengths.

The transformation is visible, visceral. You see it first in their shoulders — no longer hunched against invisible blows. Then in their eyes — bright again with possibility they'd forgotten they possessed.

Boys who arrived withdrawn and defeated leave confident and purposeful. Some move on to mainstream institutions, others pursue successful careers. All carry something precious: the knowledge that they are valued exactly as they are.

"Our son is now happy and satisfied, and he enjoys learning," shares one grateful parent.

In less than two years, thirty five boys have discovered what it feels like to finally belong. Thirty five families have watched their sons rediscover themselves. Thirty five futures on a strong and steady path.

"This place gives them the environment, the ruach of accomplishment, that they can flourish and grow in their own way," explains Harav Eliyohu Pinchos Levy, the mosad's Nasi. "I feel that this is truly hatzalas nefoshos."

"This is a mosad in which bochurim thrive, and they deserve tremendous support," notes one community askan who has witnessed these transformations firsthand.

And we're building higher.

Currently, Orach Chaim operates across multiple rented spaces; a logistical puzzle that restricts their ability to serve these boys optimally.

Building on the success of other such campuses in mosdos across the world, the planned campus will unite everything and everyone under one roof — specialised shiur-rooms, workshops, recreational facilities, and support services. Located a short drive from Manchester's kehilla, it will provide the focused but fresh environment these boys need, away from the distractions and pressures that may have contributed to their struggles elsewhere.

More space means more families finding the answer they're desperately seeking during sleepless nights and tear-filled conversations. More young men stepping into futures they thought were impossible and only for others.

The building isn't just about more space. It's about creating a permanent home where acceptance reigns, and where every boy who walks through the doors knows he belongs.

Every brick will be laid with intention. Every doorway designed wide enough for dreams that don't fit standard frames. Every window positioned to let in light for boys who've spent too long in the shadows.

And we want to start.

But we know the most important thing we can build isn't a building at all.

It's future generations.
